Editorial

The special issue on "Human Behavior and Social Institutions" explores the intricate interplay between individual actions and the broader structures that shape society. This collection of articles delves into various aspects of human behavior, shedding light on how our actions, choices, and interactions influence and are influenced by the social institutions we inhabit. The issue encompasses a diverse range of topics, offering fresh perspectives on the dynamics that underlie our social world. Within this special issue, readers can expect to find in-depth examinations of the impact of individual and collective behavior on institutions such as education, criminal justice system, and healthcare. The articles provide valuable insights into how our decisions as individuals ripple through society, affecting the quality of our institutions and, in turn, the lives of our fellow citizens.

Furthermore, the special issue encompasses studies on the reciprocal relationship between social institutions and human behavior. It uncovers how institutional norms and policies can shape our actions, motivations, and values. In essence, the special issue on "Human Behavior and Social Institutions" offers an interdisciplinary exploration of the complex and often profound ways in which human behavior and social structures interact, highlighting the importance of considering both individual agency and institutional contexts when seeking to comprehend and address the challenges of our contemporary world. Readers can anticipate a thought-provoking journey through these articles, which collectively shed light on the dynamics at the heart of our social institutions and the people who navigate them.

The OPUS Journal of Society Research (OPUS JSR) brings together a diverse range of theory, practice, and research in the pursuit of understanding human behavior in its social context. The interdisciplinary viewpoint lays the groundwork for presenting and establishing a holistic relationship with other disciplines, concepts, and methods. The OPUS JSR allows researchers to use an interdisciplinary approach to present different interpretations and alternative points of view. The theoretical frameworks that underpin the analyses and interpretations of the subjects under study are as important as the intersection of disciplines. This framing can lead to greater clarity of multiple, even contradictory findings, allowing for a better understanding of social dynamics that would otherwise be invisible if scholars concentrated on a single set of theoretical dynamics.

OPUS JSR reflects more than 10 years of journal sponsorship by ADAMOR Society Research Center and its partner organization, the Institute of Urban Studies. The OPUS Journal of Society Research is the direct successor of two previously published journals: OPUS Turkish Journal of Social Policies and Work Life Studies: OPUS International Journal of Society Research (ISSN 2528-9527 E-ISSN 2528-9535).

OPUS Journal of Society Research (JSR) is abstracted in EBSCO Information Services, ERIHP-LUS European Reference Index For The Humanities and Social Sciences, Cite Factor, TEI Index of Turkish Education, ULAKBIM TR Index, SOBIAD Citation Index and ASOS Index.
